A small group of ordinary women came together, combined their skills and reached out to assist other women like themselves. They redirected what might have been negative emotions into positive action.

In the process they learned they were not alone in advocating for radical change. Formerly battered women and others empathetic to the cause were organizing all over the United States of America. The story is inspired by true stories with names changed to protect privacy.

This is one view of the movement slowly awakening the country with one path to peace – elimination of domestic violence. In this view abused women are some of the smartest, strongest, courageous, most creative and resilient women in the world. Those who survive thrive. To get the right answers we have to ask the right questions: why do we allow domestic violence to exist? Why does society allow and in some ways support this victimization? What are some solutions that will bring peace to our homes? How do we learn non-violent conflict resolution?

Read how we can stop asking why and ask why not peace.
